Investment Manager Commentary

Global equity market was down in September influenced by hawkish Fed outlook that sees interest rate could remain higher for longer than previous estimates due to resilient US growth and inflation. The Fed's outlook caused UST yield to spike from 4.10% to 4.57% in the month that puts pressure on equity valuation. The market also weighed by rising oil price that reached USD96 per barrel, the highest since November 2022, following Saudi Arabia and Russia's decision to cut oil production by 1 million barrel per day until the end of 2023. The market is concerned that rising oil price could create further inflation pressure that can affect The Fed's rate outlook. Meanwhile China economic data showed early signs of improvement in August. Industrial production and retail sales showed better growth at 4.5% and 4.6% respectively, which fueled expectation that the worst condition is past in China.
