Investment Manager Commentary

Asia Pacific equities declined in October with performance highly divergent across markets. The selloff was concentrated in tech-heavy and AI-exposed markets, such as Korea and Taiwan, while commodity-linked and domestically-driven markets like Australia and India bucked the trend. Technology and semiconductor-heavy North Asian markets came under pressure, as investors reassessed elevated valuations and the sustainability of AI infrastructure spending. Taiwan and South Korea were consequently volatile, although strong late-month earnings from SK Hynix supported a partial rebound. China remained constrained by weak domestic demand and lingering regulatory concerns, while ASEAN markets generally lagged North Asia amid pressure from higher oil prices and a firm US dollar. The macroeconomic environment remained challenging. The IMF Regional Economic Outlook highlighted three key forces shaping Asia: the Middle East-driven energy shock, the AI-led technology boom, and continued shifts in global trade. While regional growth remained relatively resilient, higher energy costs and uneven benefits from AI increased dispersion across economies and sectors. Portfolio allocations in energy contributed positive attributions, meanwhile allocations in industrials contributed negative attributions to performance.
